Title : The Effect of Employer Branding on Intention to apply for a job with Company Reputation as a Mediating Variable (In Final Students of the Faculty of Economics and Business, Malikussaleh University)

This study aims to determine the effect of employer branding on intention to apply for a job with company reputation as a mediating variable in final students of the Faculty of Economics and Business, Malikussaleh University. This research was conducted on final students of class 2020 at the Faculty of Economics and Business, Malikussaleh University. The study population was 799 people with a sample of 130 people. The research method used is quantitative with data collection through questionnaires. Data analysis was carried out using the Smart PLS 4.0 program. The results showed that employer branding has a positive and significant effect on corporate reputation. In addition, company reputation has a positive and significant effect on intention to apply for a job. Employer branding also has a positive and significant influence on intention to apply for a job. Another important finding is that corporate reputation mediates the relationship between employer branding and intention to apply for a job or known as partial mediation. The practical implications of this study indicate that companies need to increase employer branding strategies and improve company reputation to attract potential job applicants, especially students who will enter the workforce. Academically, this study contributes to understanding the mediating role of corporate reputation in the relationship between employer branding and intention to apply for a job.
